ROGER RENTAL SAYS . . .

By following this simple diagram, you, too, can build your own remote-control device! Among the everyday household objects you'll need are a bath-tub, a toilet, a broom, and a reinforced concrete bunker.

The bath acts as a dynamic energy ratio-regulator, the toilet is a handy, reverse-modulating flow-control valve, the broom is a triple-flanged crankshaft-piston, and the bunker is to hide in when your family find out that you've taken their house apart!

IN THE LAST ISSUE OF OINK! WE LEFT HARRY (IN THE GUISE OF A YOUNG GIRL-HARRIE!) BEING FOUGHT OVER BY AMOROUS HARRY CLONES, THE PLOINKO MONSTERS WHO EXPLODE UPON EATING BANANAS!

ROBBISH MAN

A TV COMPANY IS GOING TO MAKE A FLY ON THE WALL DOCUMENTARY ABOUT ME.
THIS IS MY BIG DAY!!!

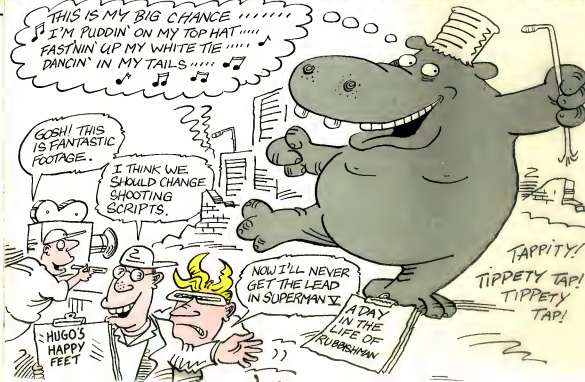

O.K. RUBBISHMAN, LET'S GET STARTED.

OUTSIDE
HELP! THE CITY IS BEING EATEN BY A GIANT HIPPO!

NOW YOU'LL SEE SOME ACTION!

WE ALL KNOW WHO THE GIANT HIPPO IS, DON'T WE, READERS?

NOW! IS THAT A TV CAMERA I CAN SEE?

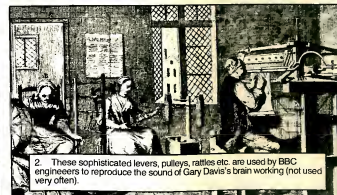

HOW RADIO SOUND EFFECTS ARE PRODUCED!

You obviously can't get a herd of elephants or a fleet of trucks into a radio studio (unless you smuggle them in inside Steve Wright's mouth). So how do radio engineers make the sounds of such things? 'Oink' reveals the secrets of this high-tech business!

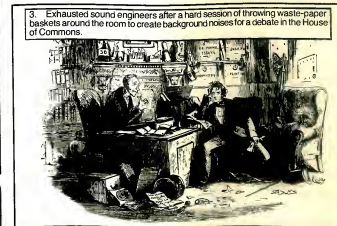

1. To achieve the sound of the sea crashing on rocks, this engineer recorded a toilet flushing with a microphone concealed in her muff. Her grandad was annoyed that she hadn't waited for him to finish, but his cries of protest made ideal seagull-noises!

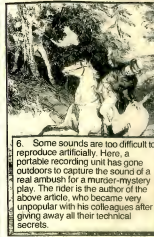

4. Sound recordists looking for the over-enthusiastic engineer who swallowed a barrel of gunpowder while attempting to create realistic noises for the radio adaptation of 'The Billy Bang Story'.

2. These sophisticated levers, pulleys, rattles etc. are used by BBC engineers to reproduce the sound of Gary Davis's brain working (not used very often).

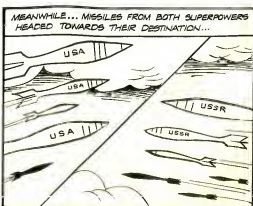

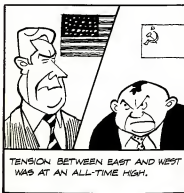

5. Stamping on a drawer, full of squeaky toys to create the crowd noises for a 'live' A-ha concert.

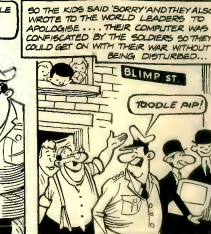

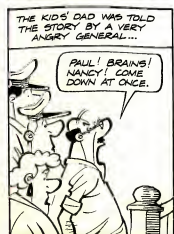

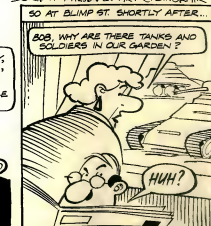

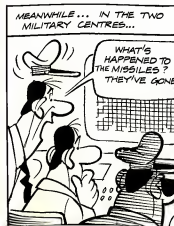

6. Some sounds are too difficult to reproduce artificially. Here, a portable recording unit has gone outdoors to capture the sound of a real ambush for a murder-mystery play. The rider is the author of the above article, who became very unpopular with his colleagues after giving away all their technical secrets.
